Robinson Crusoes.

The adventures of the crew of the bark Trinity, of New London, lost in the South Indian Ocean in the fall of 1880, are almost as interesting as those of that well known mariner Robison Crusoe. The Trinity left New London, Conn., in June, 1880, for Heard's Island, in the Southern Sea, for elephant oil. The second officer thus describes the voyage to the Island :

"She was bound for Cape de Verde Islands where she arrived alter a passage of twenty five days and shipped nineteen negroes to assist in hunting the clephants. She sailed again the same day for Heard's Island, in the South Sea, On the 16th of October, there appeared every indication of a very heavy storm. The appearance of the horizon, a heavy swell from the northeast and a weather was at hand. At four a. m. the storm increased to a hurricane and we reev- finally landed at Cape Town, whence the U. ed out all the cable on both anchors, and the S. Consul sent them home." ship began to drag toward the reef. At seven a. m. she was in six fathoms of water; she leaked badly and the pumps were put to work. At half past six she had dragged in-to four fathoms of water, while the heavy gale from the northeast continued. The captain called a counsel of all hands in the cabin to know what was best to be done to save our lives. The general verdict was to slip the cables and run the ship on shore. The captain thought it was our only chance. At nine a. m. the southeast point was three and a half miles distant. At half past nine we slipped the cables and ing the ship would not clear the land on any tack. 'The position of the unfortunate crew was thrilling enough then. There was a wild waste of waters on one side, a rocky, icebound coast on another, icebound cliffs and icebergs ahead and a line of foaming breakers astern. The only question was to find the sofest possible spot of beach on which to lay the Trinity's timbers. In a short time the ship ran aground about fifty yards from the beach. The sca made a clean breach over her with every lurch. Volunteers soon appeared and several of them jumped into the waves with lines and swam ashore.

provisions were towed ashore. "It was very cold all the time, the thermometer being below the freezing point. Seven of the colored crew were frostbitten. The landing all effected and the storm still continuing, an effort was made to creet a sort of shelter with a piece of tarpaulin. One of the crew wandered inland a little and soon came running back with the astonishing announcement that he had found a house. The house proved to be a little wooden shanty-one of five erected years before doubtless by some ship's company on the island. One of these shanties was larger than the others, and in that the crew took shelter. A fire was built, the clothes dried as much as possible, and then the exhausted men lay down and slept soundly, with the howling of the storm and moaning of the waters as a lullaby. About midnight the second mate and two seamen got up and went out to look at the ship, for upon her lasting long enough for them to get provisions depended, as they thought, their chances for existence. The three men walked down the sands opposite where the ship was lying, still broadside on. The tide had been rising. While they were looking at her Have just receeived and will open TO-DAY a and speculating as to the chances of her lasting until morning she gave a "weather roll" and floated off as erect and buoyant as ever. Straight off to sea went the Trinity, carrying with her the provisions and equipment. The men, with staring eyes, watched her until she disappeared in the storm and mist-to reappear again possibly as the Flying Yankee to traders in the South Sea-and then ran back to tell the wonderful story to their comrades. "An investigation of the resources of the island proved there were provisions enough of a certain sort. Wild cabbage abounded. It was something like our cabbage, but very strong in odor and taste. It was only by a most thorough boiling that it became palatable. Hungry men, and castaways at that, might do worse than eat wild cabbage, and the Trinity's crew boiled and ate with an sea elephants that they had come to hunt were found in great numbers, and sea leopards, an animal about eight times as large as a seal, were also caught occasionally. A cooking committee superintended the preparation of these viands, and so admirably did they succeed that the bill of fare was oftentimes a surprising novelty to those not in the secret. There was some difficulty at first about the game, but the penguin, a bird with enormous wings and enormous dignity, that prevented its flying, fell an easy victim as a look out. On it was hoisted a piece of sailcloth, which in time was substituted by a piece of fur. The men's clothes gave out piece by piece naturally enough, but the skins of the elephant and leopard made ac-ceptable garments. The blankets were reenforced by furs, and beds and pillows were manufactured with feathers of the birds captured. Their greater want was tobaco TERMS:

Captured. Their greater want was tooled and all sorts of substitutes were devised, but unsuccessfully. A sun dial was put up but was of little use, as the sun seemed to have withdrawn its light from them. The days and months were least by notches on wood and months were kept by notches on wood, and in fact the men drsssed, slept, ate and probably talked as Crusoe might might have done. There had been saved from the Trinity three or four religious books, one prayer book and about a dozen copies of a weekly

"The light-hearted fellows were destined, however, to feel the touch of sadness. In January, 1881, two of their comrades were overtaken in a snow storm and frozen to death. A coffin was made of boards, a scarce and valuable article there, and the funeral cortege started for Fairchild's Beach. where a grave had been prepared. First marched the captain, then came eight men bearing between them the coffined remains of their comrades; behind followed the remainder of the crew as mourners. And probably there never was a sader burial or truer mouners. The coffin was lowered into the sandy grave while the crew stood un-covered. In a choked voice Capt. Williams read from the prayer book the Episcopal service, while the tears trickled down many a weather beaten face. At the close, a solemn "Amen!" went up from the men, who knew not how soon each might follow, and the grave was left alone with the waves, which sung a constant requiem. "Captain Williams and his men were just about sitting down for another long winter when the little colony was electrified by the cry of the lookout: 'Sail ho!' Everybody turned out. All work was given up.

"Nearer and nearer came the white-winged messenger of joy, so near that the fear-dimmed eyes of the brave ship's company saw the ports of a war ship and, better than all, recognized the flag of their country. "It was an earnest "Thak God!" that fol-lowed the dull boom of the United States ship Marion's gun. After fifteen weary months they were indeed sayed. "There is little more to be told. The light breeze northward told us that heavy Trinity's men were taken on board, the colony at Clinton Bay found and the men
